For a long time, I felt out of sync with everything around me, striving to look for something to slow me down and deepen my focus. Photography became that anchor. Everything goes quiet the second the camera is in my hands, the moment I click and connect with my subject. In that space, I am at peace. It is an environment built on trust and patience, where a single shot can hold the weight of an entire conversation.

"Portraits of the pack" represents a quiet arrival. This archive spans three years of messing around and experimenting with portrait photography, capturing the faces of people who I am fortunate enough to call friends. Some of these images are the purest and rawest form of finding joy in trying things out. Looking at them now, though, I cringe at how garbage some of them are. I really had no idea what I was doing.

But that's okay. These clumsy attempts weren't a waste of time. Rather, they were the foundation so I could sharpen my eye and find my voice. Looking back at where I started only makes me appreciate where it landed, which is proof that you have to embrace the rough beginnings before you can master the craft.

acknowledgements

Behind every frame, there is a community. I want to express my deepest gratitude to my friends who are always down to participate in my creative pursuit. You all mean the world to me. A part of you shapes a small part of me; therefore, you are forever woven into everything I create.

Editor-in-Chief & Creative Director

hey! I'm Cash, aka murb. I'm a twenty-something-year-old photographer based in the Philippines. I photograph anything I find pretty.
